Description

Computing can be described as the application of computer technology to accomplish a goal-oriented task. It includes the design and development of various hardware and software systems. Today, computing equipment, such as PCs, laptops, handheld devices, cell phones, and smart home products, is ingrained in daily life. The evolution of the Internet of Things (IoT) has further enhanced the same. Cloud computing, social computing, ubiquitous computing, parallel computing, grid computing, etc. are only a few of the new activities made possible by the domain's constant expansion. This volume will present recent developments in the domains of computing and communications. It will primarily include current works and research findings from various research labs, universities, and institutions, and will potentially lead to the development of market-demanded products. It will report substantive results on a wide range of computational approaches applied to a wide range of problems. The series will provide volumes of works with empirical studies, theoretical analysis, or comparisons of psychological phenomena.
